Personnel data system launches for 21st century

RANDOLPH AIR FORCE BASE, Texas (AFPN) – Despite a tentative start, the Air Force's personnel data system, dubbed 'MilMod,' launched June 5, transferring millions of airmen's records into a central database, and capping a five-year effort to bring the service's personnel system into the 21st century.

"Although the implementation was delayed by a few days because of some data problems we caught with our final test checks, we're working to make the transition as painless as possible for all our customers," said Lt Col Richard Treasure, chief of the systems requirements division at the Air Force Personnel Center.

"We appreciate everyone's patience with their local military personnel flights," he said. "It may be a bit bumpy for a while when they're trying to complete personnel actions."

The new system will enable airmen to transact much of their personnel business from their desktops. The center has moved about 1.7 million records of total force airmen into the new system that will affect not only customers at every military personnel flight, but also more than 50 government agencies and organizations.

"This has been, and continues to be, a huge undertaking," Lt Col Treasure said. "Our people haven't gotten much sleep for the last few months, and we continue day and night with teams to monitor and fix the transition problems we're sure to have" as MilMod gets it's first real-world workout, he said.

Officials at the center call MilMod perhaps the biggest such system in the world and tell of Fortune 500 companies who are already visiting and taking away ideas.

"This kind of sets the cutting-edge standard" in personnel systems, Lt Col Treasure said.

But a lot of the improvements will not be seen by airmen right away, he said.

"We're optimistic that this new system will dramatically improve promotion and assignment notifications and almost every other personnel action in the Air Force of tomorrow," Lt Col Treasure said.
